Text : Indian's fear for their future

1- With an increase in hate crimes against Muslims in India in recent years, some fear the world's largest democracy is becoming dangerously intolerant under the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). The BBC's Rajini Vaidyanathan reports. It happened just days before the first phase of voting in the Indian elections. A Muslim trader in the north-eastern state of Assam was leaving work when he was accosted by a mob. Shaukat Ali was surrounded by the group, forced to kneel in sludge as he was attacked. "Are you Bangladeshi?" one man shouted, questioning his Indian citizenship. "Why did you sell beef here?" asked another as he jabbed his finger at Mr Ali. Instead of stepping in to help, the crowds that gathered filmed the incident on their mobile phones. For decades his family have served beef curry from their small food stall-but never before had they faced such trouble. Some states have made it illegal to sell beef because hindus consider the cow sacred-but it is legal to sell it in Assam. Shaukat Ali wasn't just injured physically- he was stripped of his dignity. The mob made the devout Muslim to eat pork, forcing him to chew it and then gulp it down. "I have no reason to live now," he said as he broke down, "this was an attack on my entire faith." In January last year, an eight-year-old Muslim girl was taking the family's horses to graze, when she was kidnapped in Kathua district in Indian-administered Kashmir. Held captive for a week in a Hindu temple, she was drugged and repeatedly, gang raped and tortured her before she was murdered.

2- But there's concern that those who wield power in today's India are embracing a culture of impunity. While Mr Modi condemned the rape, he didn't call for the men to resign immediately. It took weeks of pressure for them to step down. According to reports, the BJP's general secretary Ram Madhav continued to defend the men. This wasn't an isolated case. There have been several instances where members of the BJP party have openly supported the perpetrators of religious violence, showing a blatant disregard for those who have suffered. The party espouses a Hindu nationalist ideology and some of its senior figures call for a Hindu state. But party leaders have repeatedly stressed that they are not anti-minority. But BJP spokesman Nalin Kohli rejects any assertion that his party's policies have contributed to a rise in hate crimes. He accused the UN and human rights reports of skewing statistics to build up a narrative that does not exist".
