TEXT: A doctor living with the HIV-AIDS

In July 1985, Dr. Robert HUSE tested positive for the HIV virus which causes Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, but he does not have AIDS or suffer from any of its symptoms. However, according to the Federal Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, 20 to 30 per cent of those who carry the virus develop AIDS within five years of their infection.

Within a week after the information that Dr. HUSE was infected with the AIDS virus, his practice dropped from 15 to 20 patients a day to 4 to 5. Seeing that there is small chance for him to make his practice develop again here, he decided to close it. Dr. HUSE said he would take a month off to travel and consider new options. He may return to medicine by treating AIDS patients. “

Medical experts say the AIDS virus is spread through sexual intercourse or the entry of infected blood into the body. It is not spread through casual contact, and there is no reason to believe Dr. HUSE posed any danger to his patients. There are no known cases of the AIDS virus being transmitted to patients by doctors. Risk is seen as minimal. “If there's any risk of transmission at all, it's probable it would only be by surgery, or obstetrics and gynecology,” said Harold Jeff chief of the epidemiology branch of the AIDS program at the Centers of Disease Control.”I can't imagine a situation where somebody in a typical office-based practice would pose a risk”

Dr Huse said the reaction to his illness and the demise of his practice was a brutal lesson in why he tried to keep the condition private.”The reaction was about what I expected,” he said “ I didn't tell my patients because I didn't feel I was any risk to them at any time but some parents have said not enough is known about AIDS to be certain a doctor infected with the virus should be treating children “.They disagree with him. “He's a good doctor, and I will hate to lose him. « said Loneta Whiston, whose eight –month old son was treated by doctor Huse for an ear infection.
